If you've ever been interrupted when you were in a flow state, you know how difficult regaining focus can be. Yet, the constant stream of information pouring in via emails, team chats, and social media notifications demands more and more of our attention.

While it would be nice to blame technology for everything, recent studies suggest over half of all workday distractions are self-inflicted — meaning we pull ourselves out of focus, not them. In the moment, it can be easy to justify these internal pulls — "This email is too important to wait," or "It took less than a minute to check my Twitter; it isn't a real distraction."

But those small interruptions add up! It isn't just the time you lose on distractions; it also takes time and energy to control your attention again. After switching gears, our minds can linger over the previous task for over 20 minutes until we regain full concentration. Indulging the impulse to check Facebook "just for a minute" can turn into 20 minutes of trying to get back on task.
