Young people today fight for a clean planet. They worry about climate change because it affects their future. Many students join protests to ask leaders to help our Earth. They use social media to tell everyone about the problems. These young people want big changes now, not small steps later. They talk to world leaders and ask them to make better rules to protect nature. They also plant trees in their schools.

Some students skip school on Fridays to protest. This idea started with Greta Thunberg in 2018. Now, students in many countries do this too. They make signs and walk in the streets. They post their ideas online. They also write letters to important people. These young activists use simple words to explain big problems. They show pictures of places that are already changing because of the weather. They sing songs about saving our planet.

Young activists face many problems. Some adults do not listen to them because they are young. People say mean things to them, especially to girls. It is hard for them to go to school and be activists at the same time. They get tired and sad sometimes. But they keep trying because they care about the Earth. They make more people think about these problems. They have hope for a better tomorrow.

These young people know that climate change will change their lives. They want fair solutions for everyone. They think about poor countries and rich countries. They want clean air, clean water, and safe places to live. Some people say these protests do not help, but they do make people talk about climate change. The future is not clear, but these young people keep working for a better world. They believe in the power of many voices.

Read the following passage about the How Human Singing Has Adapted to Changing Technologies and mark the letter A, B, C or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questions from 31 to 40.

Singing has been music to our ears since ancient times. People have always loved to sing in different ways. In the past, singers had to have loud voices to be heard by everyone. They sang in big open spaces like theaters without any help from machines. Singers had to practice day and night to make their voices strong. This was putting in the hard yards for their art. As time went on, new tools changed how people sing and listen to music.

[I] Singers did not need to be so loud anymore. They could sing into microphones, and everyone could still hear them clearly. This happened about 100 years ago. [II] People could buy records and listen to songs at home. Singers started to use softer, more gentle voices in their songs. [III] They could whisper or sing quietly, and the microphone would pick up the sound. [IV] This made new styles of singing possible.

Today, computers have changed singing even more. Singers can fix mistakes in their songs using special programs. They can make their voices sound different or better. Some singers use auto-tune to help them stay on the right note. People can record songs in their bedrooms instead of big studios. This means more people can make and share music now. Young singers put their songs on websites for others to hear. They do not need help from big music companies.

The future of singing looks very interesting. New tools will let singers do amazing things with their voices. People might use special apps to change how they sound when they sing. Virtual reality may let us feel like we are at concerts while staying at home. Singing robots might make music with human singers. No matter how technology changes, people will still love to sing and listen to music. Singing connects us and makes us happy, just like it did thousands of years ago.
