Do you ever think about how schools will be in the future? Math, science, and history are just a few of the subjects that many people think students will study online. Students will probably be able to use a computer to study these subjects from anywhere. If a student has trouble with a subject, what will happen? They could use live videoconferencing to talk to a teacher. No matter where they live, students can get help from skilled teachers at learning centers.

There will still be schools where students go to class. People will learn how to get along with others in school. The teachers will help the kids learn how to get along with each other and work together. They will help students with group projects in and out of school.

Teens and young adults can learn important skills about the world they live in by volunteering and working at nearby businesses. This will help students fit in with their neighborhoods. Some people say that changes will not happen in schools for five years. Some people say it will take longer. But most people agree that computers will change education in the same way that TVs and phones changed people's lives decades ago.
