To become the main language of international communication, English has grown from a language that few people spoke 600 years ago. By the time English became what it is today, around 1350, it had taken on many French traits that came from the Norman invasion of 1030. Up until the 1600s, most people only spoke English in England. It hadn't even spread to Wales, Scotland, or Ireland. English did, however, start to spread around the world through trade (including the slave trade), exploration, colonization, and missionary work over the next two hundred years. So, small groups of English-speaking people formed and grew in different parts of the world. English slowly replaced other languages as the main language of international business, banking, and diplomacy as these communities grew.

About 80% of the data stored on computers around the world is in English right now. You can find two-thirds of the world's science writing in English. Technology, advertising, the media, international airports, and air traffic controllers all use English as their main language. More than 700 million people use English every day, and more than half of them are not native speakers. This are more non-native users of English than of any other language in the world.
