In Britain, there are two occasions each year when people receive presents: on Christmas Day and birthdays. In the past, your 21st birthday was the most important because it symbolized becoming an adult. People traditionally received a silver key on that day to symbolize opening the door to the adult world. Today, people in Britain legally become adults at the age of eighteen, so they often have the biggest celebration on that birthday.

The custom of giving on 25 December only dates back to Victorian times. Before that it was more common in Britain to exchange presents on New Year's Eve 31st December. These days on Christmas Eve parents put presents for young children in 'stockings' and leave them in their bedrooms while they are asleep. When children wake up in the morning, many of them believe that Santa Claus has visited them in the night and brought them their presents. Gifts for older children and grown-ups are put around the Christmas tree on Christmas Eve. Then on Christmas morning, everyone sits around the tree and opens their presents.

Easter and Mother's Day are also important days. Young children usually receive chocolate eggs at Easter, and people often give presents (chocolates or flowers) to their mothers on Mother's Day. People also receive gifts on important occasions in their lives. For example, all the guests at a wedding traditionally bring a gift for the bride and groom. And these days, students sometimes get presents from their parents if they do well on their exams.
