The word "ecotourism" comes from the words "ecology" and "tourism." Responsible travel to natural areas that protect the environment and improve the well-being of the local people“ is what the International Ecotourism Society says ecotourism is. So, taking a walk through a rainforest isn't ecotourism unless it helps the area somehow, like by giving locals jobs or protecting the wildlife. Slowly, countries have realized that they can make money and protect their natural resources.

Costa Rica has been a leader in ecotourism for a while now. In April 2012, TripAdvisor.com voted it the most popular place for ecotourism. In 1999, it created the Certification for Sustainable Tourism (CST) program. The UN's World Tourism Organization then used it as a model for the rest of Latin America. Because Costa Rica works to protect the environment, more than 25% of its land is made up of lush national parks.
